Redeemer Church Community Groups FAQ

What are Community Groups?

Community Groups at Redeemer Church supplement corporate worship by providing opportunities for people to get to know one another on a deeper level. Community Groups are made up of a small group of Redeemer members and attenders. While the primary goal of these groups is deepening our relationships with one another, there is time set apart for structured discussion of recent sermons, Bible passages, books, or other content so that we can grow and learn together. Food also is an important part of our Community Groups.

What kind of commitment am I making when I sign up for a Community Group?

Community Groups last only for one academic year. Groups meet either once or twice a month, and because your presence is beneficial to the whole group, you are asked to make participation a priority for the whole year. One way we can practically serve one another is by bringing food to gatherings as we are able at the direction of host.

How do I sign up for a Community Group?

After deciding which group you prefer to join, sign up through online registration form with this link by noting your group preferences. Attempting to honor everyone's preferences insofar as space and other factors permit, registrants will be placed in a group. Your group contact will reach out to you. Register as early as possible, because groups often fill up quickly. We will work with you to find the best available option for you.

Can my children come?

Most groups welcome children, and some even plan to arrange childcare. If childcare is arranged, a reasonable cost will be shared by all parents who utilize the babysitters. Elementary children and older can participate with the adults or play during the discussion time. Be sure to talk with your particular group's contact person with questions or concerns. However, finances should never be a hindrance, so talk with your group's contact person or Jason Piland for assistance.
